BACKGROUND

The urban heritage of Mediterranean countries is rich and diverse, bearing witness to the centuries-old history and multiple cultural influences that have shaped the cities of this region. Old quarters, labyrinthine medinas, archaeological remains and vernacular architecture coexist harmoniously with more contemporary elements. These Mediterranean cities bear the legacy of Phoenician, Roman, Byzantine, Arab and Ottoman civilisations, among others. The bustling markets, historic squares, winding streets and emblematic buildings are all testimony to an inestimable cultural wealth. However, the Mediterranean urban heritage faces modern challenges such as demographic pressure, rapid urbanisation and the need to reconcile preservation and development. Preserving this heritage is synonymous with preserving the region's unique cultural identity, offering future generations a tangible link with their past.

However, some Mediterranean regions, rich in urban heritage, remain on the margins of tourism development, leading to an alarming deterioration of their precious heritage. The reasons for this exclusion include a lack of financial resources and conservation techniques, as well as inexperience and disinterest in urban tourism.

This heritage faces modern challenges such as demographic pressure, rapid urbanisation and the need to reconcile protection and development. Its preservation is synonymous with safeguarding the region's unique cultural identity, offering future generations a tangible link with their past.

The tourism value of urban heritage in the Mediterranean has gained in importance in a world that is placing increasing emphasis on the sustainable development of cities. By putting this heritage on the tourist map, cities can attract more visitors, boost their local economies and preserve their unique cultural heritage. E-tourism platforms could also facilitate the collection of information and funds, contributing to the preservation and revitalisation of urban heritage and offering a solution for its valorisation. These same digital tools can open up other opportunities for the promotion, tourism and marketing of this urban heritage as a tourism product.

THE AIM OF THE SYMPOSIUM

- Bring together researchers, academics, professionals and managers from different sectors at the event organised by FSTGAT, Constantine 1 University, in collaboration with the LASTERNE laboratory and the CRAT spatial planning research centre.
- To benefit from various experiences linked to the preservation and tourist enhancement of urban heritage in the countries of the Mediterranean basin, in order to exchange knowledge and good practice.
- To formulate concrete recommendations to improve the safeguarding and enhancement of precious cultural heritages, taking into account the specific realities of troubled Mediterranean regions.
- To propose practical measures to encourage cultural promotion via E-tourism and social networks, aimed at raising awareness among a wider public and mobilising financial resources for the preservation of urban heritage.
- To contribute to the overall effort to stimulate the local economy, promote sustainability and strengthen the link between current and future generations with their unique cultural heritage.
